The changing face of Europe poses new and exciting challenges for the media and a totally different approach to journalism training is now required. The Schools of Journalism in Århus (Denmark) and Utrecht (the Netherlands) offer an international program for advanced students in journalism and young professionals. In 1990, the Journalism Schools in Århus and Utrecht launched a joint specialization course in European journalism. This specialization program can not be compared to regular academic exchange. Students live and study in two countries, travel to various European locations, and produce an exciting variety of journalistic products. Course work, seminars, travels and magazine production provide the participants with opportunities for learning through critical analysis, observation and work.

In September, students begin in Utrecht with an intensive study period of three months on European institutions, politics and philosophy, recent European history, European media and regional economics. The acquired knowledge will be tested during a seminar in Brussels. This seminar in November concentrates on the role of the European Commission and the European Parliament. Students move to Denmark in January. Beginning with an introductory course on Danish society, lectures follow on the foreign policies of the larger European countries. The principal focus is on conceivable models for a future Europe. Furthermore, there are lectures in international economy. The program ends with the production of a final exam print media project and an oral exam in mid June.
